THE AIM OF THE COURSE:

This course offers an introduction to the visions of key political thinkers from the ancient Greeks through the early-twentieth century. We will begin by examining the extremely influential thought of Plato and Aristotle, then turn to the radical rethinking of politics by Machiavelli and Hobbes, followed by the early modern thought of Locke and Rousseau, then two major nineteenth-century figures — J. S. Mill and Arthur Schopenhauer — and finish with the political insights of Freud.

Through close readings of, and conscientious engagement with, the primary texts of key thinkers in the Western tradition of political thought, students will become familiar with each authors' unique voice, style, concerns, definitions, concepts and arguments. Some select secondary literature will augment understanding of these primary texts by providing historical and scholarly context. The seminar format of the course invites informed and civil discourse amongst all students in the spirit of liberal learning.

Excerpts from the required texts to study in class will be provided each week.

I highly recommend you purchase copies of the main texts; indeed, they should be in the personal library of every well-read person. E-versions are poor substitutes for owning these classic works. Nor are they expensive: used copies in particular can be very affordable.

Supplementary reading material is in the library or will be provided on e-learning; it is not required reading, but is highly recommended.

CLASS RULES

The learning environment will be traditional and classical: in class, students' attention will be solely occupied by the text and our conversation. To that end:

1. Laptops and mobile phones must be put aside; exceptions may be made for those with special learning requirements.
2. Powerpoint slides will not be used by the lecturer; all instruction will be communicated verbally.
3. Bring paper and pen(s) to each class (and perhaps a highlighter); absent of your laptop, this will be your only means of taking notes.
4. Students will be expected to participate: all will take turns reading aloud, and all will occasionally be asked questions by the instructor.
